

Provost's use of AI angers campus

Dartmouth leader relied heavily on tool, review says

Dartmouth College is in an uproar after news emerged that its top academic officer, provost Santiago Schnell, heavily relied on artificial intelligence to write multiple published articles — including an opinion piece about how universities should navigate the ethics of AI use.

Faculty are now calling for Schnell's firing and accusing him of violating Dartmouth's Academic Honor Principle.

Santiago Schnell wrote an op-ed on AI ethics.

The scandal couldn't come at a worse time for the Hanover, N.H., school, which is in the midst of celebrating its 70th anniversary as the birthplace of AI. Earlier this month, the college's president, Sian Leah Beilock, authored a piece for the Atlantic titled "Why I Want More AI at Dartmouth." Now, some faculty, students, and alumni blame her for fostering a culture where academic leaders aren't held accountable to the same standards as students.

Ben Stevenson, a Dartmouth senior majoring in history, described recent developments as "Orwellian."

"Dartmouth is claiming to be a national leader, but really Dartmouth is a national embarrassment," he said.

Last month, Schnell, who has been on the job a little over a year, wrote an op-ed for The DARTMOUTH, Page A10

Storm preparation gears up as off-season nor'easter bears down

Drenching rains and high winds predicted with power outages, flooding to follow

Southern New England braced Friday for a powerful weekend storm by pulling out an emergency playbook for nor'easters that's typically reserved for winter.

Following forecasts of heavy, soaking rain and dangerous, gale-force winds, millions of residents were warned of flooding, power outages, and falling trees on Saturday and Sunday.

Coastal communities hunkered down in the expectation of lashing seas and higher tides. Public transportation prepared for disruptions, and state officials urged residents to stay off the highways during the storm.

Four to six inches of rain was predicted to fall on Southeastern Massachusetts as the storm intensifies Saturday before gradually easing on Sunday. Cape Cod and the South Coast, in particular, were preparing for gusts of 50 to 55 miles per hour, while Boston and Providence could be buffeted by door-rattling gusts of 30 miles per hour.

Early autumn is usually hurricane season, but none has hit the Atlantic basin so far this year. The last time that happened was 112 years ago.

Instead, New England is grappling with a rare and gnarly nor'easter, which typically hit the region from November through March. The storms derive their name STORM, Page A10

Are vulnerable GOP candidates finally breaking from Trump?

By James Pindell

For over a decade, the question has been asked probably a million times.

When will Republicans break away from Donald Trump?

ANALYSIS We might finally have an answer: around 40 days until the 2026 midterm elections.

The recent days have been defined by sagging polling numbers for Trump that are so bad Republican candidates in tight contests for the first time are creating real distance.

For Republican Senate candidates Ashley Hinson of Iowa and Mike Rogers of Michigan, and incumbent Senator Jon Husted of Ohio, the breakaway was based on policy, specifically on the Iran war, now almost seven months old.

Citing how the war has caused high prices, especially for diesel fuel, Hinson took to social media to say, "The war needs to be brought to a successful and immediate end." It's especially notable that, as a member of the House, Hinson voted four times this year against measures that would have curtailed the president's war powers.

Joining her was Rogers, who made a similar argument in a video from a grocery store, saying, "The war in Iran needs to end and end quickly."

On Tuesday, Husted, who polls show is losing his race, said much the same thing in an interview after Hinson and Rogers. (Notably, he still voted with Trump this week on

MARTHA KAROLINA ROJAS ALVAREZ, speaking about the ICE agent who shot her partner

Without answers, a family waits for justice after shooting by ICE

PORTLAND, Maine — Every morning, 3-year-old Dulce wakes up and searches for her father. She looks up toward the sky and calls out for him: "¡Papá!"

Her mother, Martha Karolina Rojas Alvarez, watches in anguish. It has been more than two months since an ICE agent shot and killed her partner and Dulce's father, Johan Sebastián Durán Guerrero, while he was heading to work in Biddeford.

For most, the days here in Southern Maine have returned to their normal rhythms. The flowers at the memorial on the corner where Durán Guerrero was killed have dried out, and the demonstrations protesting his death have become less frequent.

For Rojas Alvarez, though, time seems to stand still, she told the Globe at her lawyer's office on Tuesday, in her first sit-down interview with a newspaper. Attorneys for Rojas Alvarez say they still have no insight into where the federal investigation into the shooting stands or whether there is an ongoing, serious federal inquiry.

She longs to go back home to Colombia one day. But she is staying for now in the hope that she will see some resolution with Durán Guerre-ro's case. The Maine attorney general's office has helped her petition for a special visa for victims of crimes.

"I want justice to be carried out as soon as possible," Rojas Alvarez said in the Spanish-language interview. "What that person did was murder."

She said Durán Guerrero, who was 25 when he was killed, often spoke of watching Dulce grow up, taking her to school, celebrating her birthdays. The couple had planned to save money while working in the United States and eventually return to Colombia with enough to buy a house.

She keeps remembering that she is essentially a widow. The strangeness of that word washes over her again and again. She is just 23.

"I feel very alone, very unprotected, with a lot of fear," Rojas Alvarez said.

She no longer knows what to expect when she walks out the door. Could something happen to her, too? "I don't want to leave my daughter alone," she said.
