

TOMER NEUBERG Associated Press

VAHID SALEMI Associated Press

GLOWING smoke fills the sky in Tel Aviv after Iran attacked late Friday. In northern Tehran, right, a firefighter calls out near a residential compound after one of Israel's strikes, which mostly targeted Iran's military leadership and nuclear and military infrastructure.

Iran retaliates after Israel's attack

Escalation raises fears of a full-on regional conflict likely to embroil U.S.

By NABIH BULOS

AMMAN, Jordan — Iran launched successive missile barrages on Israel late Friday, a retaliation for a punishing Israeli campaign the same day that wiped out the upper echelons of Iran's military leadership along with important parts of its nuclear and military infrastructure.

The exchanges constituted the most significant escalation between the longtime adversaries — raising the possibility of a protracted conflict and fears the U.S. would become embroiled in another war in the Middle East. Sirens echoed in showed a residential tower with fire raging inside a number of apartments, while other video showed smoke wreathing several buildings in central parts of the city and missiles falling on empty intersections. Videos from Iran and published on social media depicted fire and visible damage to several residential buildings in Tehran.

Broadcasts from Tel Aviv Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, with the nighttime skies over the latter lighted with bursts of yellow as missiles from Israel's Arrow defense system lanced up to intercept Iranian ballistic missiles. The bass-drum beat of multiple explosions could be heard as far away as neighboring Jordan.

Others showed entire buildings having collapsed, with rubble carpeting the street. One image — The Times could not verify its authenticity — showed a bloodied child lying on a debris-covered floor. Israeli officials said that more than 40 people were [See Mideast, A4]

Raid fear revives 'notario' scheme

Authorities warn of scammers posing as immigration lawyers for vulnerable people.

By LIBOR JANY

After she was assaulted by her romantic partner in 2000 while living in Los Angeles County, Maria Gutierrez Saragon turned to a family friend who said he could help her secure immigration papers.

Because she had been the victim of a crime, the friend said, he could help her obtain authorization to stay in the U.S.

While it's true that immigrant crime victims qualify for special benefits in some instances, the promise to get Gutierrez Saragon citizenship within three months at a discount dragged on for more than a decade. A housekeeper with a modest income, she was slowly bled for more than $100,000 through a mix of false assurances and threats.

"I had to give him all my money instead of being able to buy my children what they need," she said between sobs in an interview. "It was like torture. Every time the phone rang or every time a paper arrived for me, they were asking for more money."

She was a victim of so-called notario fraud, in which scammers acting as lawyers extract large sums from vulnerable immigrants.

The swindle is not a new one. But despite longstanding campaigns to raise awareness, advocates and law enforcement officials say they are concerned about a [See Notario, A8]

As different as night and day

JASON ARMOND Los Angeles Times

GINA FERAZZI Los Angeles Times

BOTH POLICE and protesters have said the difference between night and day has been palpable in L.A.'s already quiet downtown, with more tension at night.

L.A. police chief, sheriff walk a fine line

They back their forces, for whom immigration debate may be complex

By LIBOR JANY

While publicly chastising groups protesting immigration raids, Los Angeles Police Chief Jim McDonnell has offered support to officers in his Latino-majority department who may have mixed feelings about the Trump administration's crackdown.

In a department-wide missive sent out earlier this week as protests ramped up, McDonnell acknowledged some officers were "facing criticism from the community or wrestling with the personal impact" of recent events and needed support. "When federal immigration enforcement actions take place in communities that may reflect your own heritage, neighborhoods, or even your family's story, it can create a deep and painful conflict," he wrote. "You may be wearing the [See Support, A8]

As the sun sets each evening, tensions rise, but calm and cleanup come in the morning for L.A. protests.

By HAILEY BRANSON-POTTS, REBECCA ELLIS, JULIA WICK AND JAMES QUEALLY

On Wednesday morning, the 18-year-old drove an hour from her home in Ontario to downtown Los Angeles to protest ongoing federal immigration raids and President Trump's deployment of the military to the city.

Gryphon Woodson, a new high school graduate, grabbed a pair of goggles and a black bandanna to cover her face. It was her first-ever protest. And after watching videos of chaos in the streets all week, she figured she would be joining throngs of passionate demonstrators.

But she arrived too early. As she stood outside the graffiti-covered Federal Building on Los Angeles Street around 11 a.m., the downtown streets were clear. Clusters of police officers stood at ease around courthouses and City Hall, drinking coffee and Red Bull, chatting with dog walkers, scrolling on their phones. "I thought there were [See Protests, A14]

City braces for 'No Kings' protests

At least a dozen groups are planning anti-Trump events in the area after a week of immigration raids.

By SUMMER LIN, LIBOR JANY, CHRISTOPHER BUCHANAN, CONNOR SHEETS AND DAKOTA SMITH

Los Angeles and other major cities across the nation are girding for widespread demonstrations against the Trump administration Saturday as the federal government expands its aggressive immigration enforcement crackdown beyond Southern California.

In Washington, the Army will celebrate 250 years of service, as well as President Trump's 79th birthday, with an unprecedented military parade. In response, many around the country will be gathering for "No Kings" demonstrations to voice their opposition to the Trump administration's policies.

In Los Angeles, where federal raids have caused many immigrants to avoid public workplaces and remain in hiding, at least a dozen different activist groups are planning to protest Saturday. The planned anti-Trump event follows eight days of demonstrations downtown, where thousands have condemned federal operations aimed at chasing down and capturing unauthorized immigrants at their jobs and on city streets.

The protests were organized by Indivisible, the American Civil Liberties Union and 50501, among others. [See Protests, A9]

Polarized reactions to Padilla incident

Republicans chastise senator, while his fellow Democrats call for an investigation.

By JAMES RAINEY AND SANDRA McDONALD

A day after federal agents forcibly restrained and handcuffed U.S. Sen. Alex Padilla at a Los Angeles news conference, leaders of the country's two political parties responded in what has become a predictable fashion — with diametrically opposed takes on the incident.

Padilla's fellow Democrats called for an investigation and perhaps even the resignation of the senator's nemesis, Homeland Security Secretary Kristi Noem, for what they described as the unprecedented manhandling of a U.S. senator who was merely attempting to ask a question of a fellow public official.

Noem and fellow Republicans continued to depict Padilla as a grandstander, whose unexpected appearance at Noem's news conference seemed to her security detail to represent a threat, as she tried to speak to reporters at the Federal Building in Westwood.

Republicans continued Friday to chastise Padilla, using words like "launch," "lunge" and "bum-rush" to describe Padilla's behavior. [See Padilla, A9]

Four escape from detention center

Immigrant detainees broke through a wall and fled facility in New Jersey. NATION, A7

Hospital to halt trans services

Children's Hospital Los Angeles cites mounting pressure from White House. CALIFORNIA, B1

Flags at protests promote defiance

Demonstrators proudly wave banners of other countries in response to raids. CALIFORNIA, B1

Weather

Partly sunny. L.A. Basin: 81/62. B8

Markets

Opinion Voices A12

For the latest news, go to latimes.com.

