

Marines in place in LA; cities get set for rallies

Troops' role is protection not law enforcement, their commander says

By Amy Taxin, Lolita C. Baldor, and Jaimie Ding
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — After a week of protests over federal immigration raids, about 200 Marines moved into Los Angeles on Friday to guard a federal building in the city while communities across the country prepped for what's anticipated to be a nationwide wave of large-scale demonstrations against President Trump's policies this weekend.

The Marine troops with rifles, combat gear, and walkie-talkies took over some posts from National Guard members who were deployed to the city after the protests erupted last week. Those protests sparked dozens more over several days around the country, with some leading to clashes with police and hundreds of arrests.

The Marines had not been seen on Los Angeles city streets until Friday. They finished training on civil disturbance and have started to replace Guard members protecting the federal building west of downtown, so the Guard soldiers can be assigned to protect law enforcement officers on

PROTESTS, Page A7

Now Canada looks to limit immigration

As US cracks down, the path north gets harder

By Paul Heintz
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

Once a haven for refugees no longer welcome in the United States, Canada is turning a cold shoulder at a moment when the loss of protections in the US is prompting some immigrants to look northward.

The country's newly elected prime minister, Mark Carney, may be known in the US for standing up to President Trump, but critics say his Liberal government's first major piece of legislation takes a page from Trump's immigration agenda: The Strong Borders Act, unveiled this month in Ottawa, would crack down on fentanyl trafficking and organized crime, and impose several new restrictions or additional powers to curb immigration.

Julia Sande, a human rights attorney with Amnesty International Canada, said the legislation would "slam the door" on those seeking asylum in the country.

"It's deeply discouraging and, frankly, scary to see the government going down this path," Sande said.

Carney's move comes in the wake of a recent US

CANADA, Page A6

LEO CORREA/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Israel's Iron Dome air defense system fired to intercept missiles over Tel Aviv on Friday. Iran fired "fewer than 100" missiles, an Israeli military spokesperson said. Iran said it struck dozens of targets in Israel.

Iran strikes back at Israel as leaders ratchet up rhetoric

Netanyahu cites existential threat; Khamenei says, "They started a war"

By Farnaz Fassihi, Aaron Boxerman, Qasim Nauman, and Isabel Kershner
NEW YORK TIMES

Iran was reeling and firing missiles and drones Friday after Israel carried out its largest attack ever against Iran, waves of coordinated airstrikes that hit nuclear sites and killed much of the country's military chain of command along with several nuclear scientists.

Israel's assault early Friday and Iran's response immediately raised the prospect of a wider conflict engulfing the Middle East, although Iran's military capabilities and its proxy militias have been weakened by 20 months of Israeli attacks.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu described the assault as a last resort to prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon, which Israel calls an existential threat, and he vowed that the attacks would last "as many days as it takes."

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, said in a televised statement Friday that Iran

MEGHADAD MADADI/TASNIM NEWS/AFP VIA GETTY IMAGES

First responders and others gathered in the area of a missile strike in Tehran on Friday.

would act forcefully to punish Israel for the attack. "Life will be dark for them," he said. "They started it. They started a war."

Iran's foreign minister, Abbas Araghchi, told the United Nations Security Council on Friday that Israel's strikes had killed 78 people and injured 329 others.

In response, Iran fired "fewer than 100" missiles in two waves toward Israel on Friday, most of which were intercepted by Israel's robust air defenses, according to Brigadier General Effie Defrin, an Israeli military spokesperson. But several buildings were hit, some with shrapnel.

At least 40 people were wounded in Tel Aviv and the surrounding area, according to a tally from three hospitals. Most of the patients were moderately injured, but a few were in critical condition.

Iran's Revolutionary Guard said it had struck dozens of targets in Israel "forcefully and with precision," including military and defense sites, in response to Israel's attacks.

The Israeli military said that Iranian forces had also launched about 100 drones at Israel and that a missile fired from Yemen had landed in the Israeli-occupied West Bank. Israel said it had shot down many of the drones, and there were no immediate reports of casualties.

Israel's attack was an audacious attempt to cripple a country that it has been battling for years, with covert operations aimed at killing Iran's military commanders and nuclear scientists, and direct combat against forces it supports across the Middle East, including Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Gaza Strip, where Israel re-

ISRAEL-IRAN, Page A6

The unrelenting shock and grief were still raw in India, where a plane crash killed at least 269 people. A4.

The jury in the Karen Read retrial was sent home for the weekend after deliberating less than two hours. B1.

The rain's the same

Saturday: Cooler, drizzly. High: 59-64. Low: 53-58.

Sunday: Cloudy, cool. High: 60-65. Low: 54-59.

Comics and Weather, D4-5. Obituaries, C9.

VOL. 307, NO. 165

*

Suggested retail price
$4.00

MARCH TO 250

Descendants take pride in their ties to Bunker Hill

By Brian MacQuarrie
GLOBE STAFF

Matt Woodfin, a 32-year-old Charlestown resident, slowly pulled a thin blade of fine steel from its two-century-old ornamental scabbard, tracing the carefully engraved name of his seventh great-uncle on the shining metal.

"Henry Dearborn," the inscription reads, a gift from President Thomas Jefferson to his secretary of war, a New Hampshire native who on June 17, 1775, fought the vaunted British army with more than 2,000 other New Englanders at the Battle of Bunker Hill.

"This has a reverent feel to it," Rich Woodfin, Matt Woodfin's father, said softly as the pair stood recently near the small, undeveloped remnants of the battlefield beneath the Bunker Hill Monument.

JOHN TLUMACKI/GLOBE STAFF

Matt Woodfin (left), with his dad, Rich Woodfin, held the sword of Henry Dearborn, his seventh great-uncle, near the Bunker Hill Monument.

Dearborn "had heard of the Lexington and Concord battles, and he just started walking south," the elder Woodfin said. "He made his bones here, and it took over his life."

This weekend, the Woodfins and about 50 other descendants of Bunker Hill veterans will arrive in Charlestown to commemorate the bravery and sacrifices of their ancestors in the first such gathering since the monument's cornerstone was laid in 1825, organizers said.

By bringing descendants together, the event's organizers hope that closely held stories of Bunker Hill will be shared among the families and later circulated to a wider audience who might know little of the battle beyond its famous name.

"Who were these men and these boys?" said Julie Hall, president of the Charlestown Historical Society, which

DESCENDANTS, Page A10

Celebrating ideals of democracy

Reenactment to call out founders' values

By A.Z. Madonna
GLOBE STAFF

The celebratory crowd that gathered in downtown Boston on June 17, 1825, was perhaps 100,000 strong, around double the city's population. People had come from near and far. President John Quincy Adams and his entire Cabinet were there, along with musicians, poets, and orators.

In a procession over two miles long, the tide of civilians and military companies marched to Charlestown, to the site where the Colonial militia 50 years before had faced down a larger and better equipped British force at the crucial Battle of Bunker Hill.

The crowds had come because a slab of stone was to be laid, the ceremonial first step in the 18-year project of building the Bunker Hill Monument. The stone was anointed with oil and corn and wine, and all day long the crowd lis-

BUNKER HILL, Page A10