

REPAIR work is underway after a severed trunk line flooded streets and shut a portion of Sunset Boulevard.

SWEEPING CHANGES ORDERED AT ICE LOCKUP

Federal judge demands reforms in detainees' conditions at Adelanto center.

BY BRITTNY MEJIA AND RUBEN VIVES

A federal judge on Thursday ordered the government to immediately overhaul conditions at the Adelanto ICE Processing Center, finding that detainees were likely to succeed on claims that the government violated their constitutional and disability rights.

U.S. District Judge Sunshine S. Sykes granted a renewed motion for a preliminary injunction in a class-action lawsuit brought by detainees and immigrant advocacy groups, ordering the Department of Homeland Security and Immigration and Customs Enforcement to make sweeping changes to medical care, sanitation, food, recreation, disability accommodations and visitation while the litigation continues.

In her order, Sykes said the plaintiffs "have demonstrated they are likely to prevail — or at the least, raise serious questions — on the merits of their Fifth Amendment and Rehabilitation Act claims."

Among other things, Sykes ordered the government to ensure detainees were provided 24-hour access to clean potable drinking water, nutritious and sanitary meals that contain a sufficient number of calories, and adequate sanitation throughout the facility, to include daily cleaning and mold remediation.

She prohibited the government from placing detainees in administrative segregation unless doing so was necessary to address a security threat to staff or the facility, or if a detainee requested it.

"Any segregation must [See Adelanto, A8]

Water main rupture is L.A.'s worst in years

Sunset Boulevard expected to be closed for days

BY HANNAH FRY AND JAZMIN ALVARADO

The massive Sunset Strip trunk line rupture was L.A.'s worst in years, spilling 17 million gallons of water and forcing the closure of Sunset Boulevard for at least several days.

Closures are in place on Sunset Boulevard from San Vicente Boulevard/North Clark Street to Horn Avenue, where the 110-year-old pipe burst on Thursday, unleashing a torrent of water and leaving a massive sinkhole. Larrabee Street at Santa Monica Boulevard and Palm Avenue at Santa Monica Boulevard are also closed, according to the city of West Hollywood.

Soft closures, open only to residents, are in place at Shoreham Drive at Sunset Boulevard, Holloway Drive between Palm and Hancock avenues and San Vicente Boulevard at Cynthia Street.

The closures are poised to be a significant disruption to businesses and residents along the typically bustling section of West Hollywood. The bulk of the damage is just blocks from Whisky A Go Go, the famed club where many legendary rock bands got their start. Officials are asking motorists to avoid the area over the next several days so Los Angeles Department of Water and Power repair crews can work.

The streets surrounding the Sunset Strip were quiet early Friday aside from the hum of idling utility vehicles. An employee at a liquor store on Sunset told The Times she'd on- [See Sunset, A7]

THE speakers' unobtrusive placement complements their immersive musicality.

The Bowl's new sonic beast

AI audio at the historic venue promises to transform the live-music experience but also raises questions

MARK SWED
CLASSICAL MUSIC
CRITIC

Hardly anyone walking up Peppertree Lane notices the Hollywood Bowl Museum on the way to the amphitheater entrance. The overlooked museum, however, has been refreshed with an enchanting new exhibition. Well-timed, it provides an excellent primer on changing L.A. mores seen through the history of the Bowl over the past century.

Change is again upon us. As Angelenos have evolved, so have our ideas about the Bowl. A concert was a concert and audiences of yore dressed for the Los Angeles Philharmonic, indoors or out. Men wore coats, ties and fedoras. I have a photo of my mother at the Bowl on a chilly 1940s evening sporting, like other ladies around her in the inexpensive bleachers, her mink stole.

The Bowl was said to boast, before the construction of the Hollywood Freeway, a natural acoustical, well, bowl. Even so, sonic adventurers, beginning with Leopold Stokowski in the 1930s, experimented with amplification in an obsession [See Bowl, A9]

Trump attacks elections ahead of midterms

Without evidence of illegal balloting, the administration demands voter data.

BY ANA CEBALLOS, JUSTINE MCDANIEL AND ANDREA CASTILLO

WASHINGTON — President Trump and his allies escalated attacks on U.S. elections on Friday, after the president's prime-time effort to convince Americans that the nation's voting systems are fundamentally flawed, and threatened to punish California and other Democratic states that refuse the administration's demands for voter data.

Homeland Security Secretary Markwayne Mullin threatened local election officials with fines and prison if they don't turn over voter rolls to federal officials seeking to root out purported illegal voting by noncitizens. "Try us," California Gov. Gavin Newsom wrote on X in response to Mullin's threats. He added that "California has free, fair, and secure elections" and that the state "will fight for them."

The administration's threats — made less than four months before the November midterm elections — are a continuation of an aggressive Trump-led campaign to use the federal government to attempt to overhaul the nation's voting systems and sow public mistrust in elections.

The administration has tried for months to compel Democratic-led states into handing over sensitive voter data to the federal government, but the efforts have run into resistance in courts, in part out of concern for privacy laws. The courts have also reaffirmed in many cases that the Constitution gives states — not the federal government — primary authority over elections.

On Friday, Mullin said his agency has found "as many as" 190,832 possible noncitizens registered to vote in California, along with more in three other Democratic-led states. He said Homeland Security arrived at those numbers by checking the four states' public voter records.

He vowed to withhold federal election security grants from states until they [See Mistrust, A6]

L.A. Unified faces devastating cuts

With steep budget reductions, school district could be greatly downsized.

BY HOWARD BLUME

In less than three weeks Los Angeles school officials must show, under state law, how they will carry out the steepest budget cuts in a generation after county education authorities concluded they lack confidence in district leadership to prevent bankruptcy.

The options are painful and stand to dramatically downsize the nation's second-largest school district, which is facing a multi-billion-dollar projected deficit. Employee furlough days, campus closures, job reductions and thousands of layoffs are among the looming cuts — actions the school board has largely postponed until July 1, 2027.

Instructions from the Los Angeles County Office of Education require L.A. Unified to detail specifically how it will carry out the future cuts; otherwise the county superintendent will appoint a trustee with authority to veto spending decisions. If the district were to become insolvent, then an appointed administrator would take all power away from Supt. Andrés E. Chait and the Board of Education — an action without precedent in LAUSD and a rarity among the nation's largest school systems.

The warnings have sent shock waves through the district and angered employee unions. Parents and employees in online forums expressed a range of views, including disbelief, hand-wringing and I-told-you-so — with a wide distribution for blame.

District officials have been virtually silent about the directives from the county office, often referred to as LACOE.

"We have discussed this matter" with the county office "and appreciate their ongoing partnership and guidance and will work with the LACOE to ensure compliance with their requirements," district officials said [See L.A. Unified, A8]

Rotting meat spoils L.A. neighborhood

BY CLARA HARTER AND SALVADOR HERNANDEZ

Air regulators have slapped Lineage Logistics with multiple violations related to the putrid odor at its Boyle Heights facility after receiving more than 720 complaints from residents since Sunday.

So far this week, the South Coast Air Quality Management District has issued five notices of violations to the company as it works to remove 85 million pounds of rotting food from the burned remains of its cold storage warehouse.

"Have you ever smelled a dead animal in the street? It's like that," said Jaime Ramirez, who lives near the facility.

Lineage began cleanup of the site on July 6 and its Chief Operating Officer Jeff Rivera said at a town hall meeting last week that the company was moving as quickly as possible with a goal of beating the 45-day timeline set by L.A. Mayor Karen Bass to complete the process.

It remains unclear when all the meat will be removed, but the company is taking steps to mitigate the odor by wrapping most of the building in a temporary material and using misting systems.

But residents say those efforts have failed to stop the nauseating smell emanating from the rotting food and feasting vermin from wafting around the neighborhood, making it difficult for children to play outside and those living nearby to breathe at times.

On Friday morning, the streets of the neighborhoods near the warehouse were nearly empty as residents sought refuge indoors. Doors were closed, windows shut and chairs on shaded porches were empty as the smell of rotting food filled [See Warehouse, A7]

JOAN MONFORT Associated Press
MESSI cradles his future rival Yamal in 2007.

Cross-generation World Cup battle

Argentine legend Lionel Messi faces off against young star Lamine Yamal and Spain in the final. SPORTS, B12

Strikes escalate across Mideast

U.S. attacks bridges and energy sites. Iran responds by launching missiles into U.S.-allied nations. WORLD, A2

Weather

Partly sunny.
L.A. Basin: 86/67. B8

Salinas grower pulls lettuce

Taylor Farms is the subject of an inquiry into the multistate cyclosporiasis outbreak. CALIFORNIA, B1

Sad end for Pea Soup Andersen's

Buellton's roadside icon, which closed in 2024, has been vandalized. CALIFORNIA, B1

For the latest news, go to latimes.com.

Markets A11
Opinion Voices A13