HOME IS WHERE WE WANT TO BE

The home opener. A warm day. A Red Sox win. Maybe spring really is here. Before the Red Sox took to the field and beat the St. Louis Cardinals, 13-9, members of the 1975 team that won the American League pennant 50 years ago were honored by the crowd. As Dan Shaughnessy writes, “If you are a baseball fan, be glad that you live in New England. . . . You reside in a special spot where this stuff still matters, where folks honor the past, and an early-April, nine-inning slop-fest stokes long-dormant fires and inspires irrational hope that maybe this is going to be one of those special seasons.” C1.

Clockwise from top: Hall of Famer Carl Yastrzemski greeted fans at Fenway Park as they honored the 1975 team. Giving him a pat on the back was Hall of Fame catcher Carlton Fisk. Fans in the right-field stands leaned over to grab a ball during batting practice. Red Sox shortstop Trevor Story watched his first-inning homer, which drove in three runs.

A federal judge transferred the case of Rümeyşa Öztürk to federal court in Vermont, where the Tufts graduate student can continue to challenge her detention. B1.

The Trump administration was ordered to arrange for the return of a Maryland man to the United States, after he was mistakenly deported to a notorious El Salvador prison. A2.

South Korean President Yoon Suk Yeol was removed from office over his effort to impose martial law. A4.

Fired, rehired federal workers in limbo

While they're getting paid, some are still on leave and what's next is anyone's guess

Amber Crist thought she had found the job she would retire from. In September, she left her tax auditor position with the West Virginia state government to work as a revenue agent in the small business division of the Internal Revenue Service. As a single mother with three kids, the increased pay and better benefits that came with the federal government job were too good to pass up.

Then, on Valentine's Day, she was one of the thousands of federal workers in their probationary period who were laid off. For over a month, Crist had no income. Her unemployment insurance claim was denied because the IRS alleged she was fired due to poor performance. Crist, 42, had to rely on family and friends to help her buy groceries and pay bills. She spent her days applying to other jobs, trying to forget her fantasy of retiring as a decorated civil servant. But on March 17, Crist was reinstated at the IRS after two judges ruled that the federal government must, at least temporarily, rehire laid off probationary employees. Now, she's being paid to sit idle on administrative leave. “I'm still not doing anything. That's hard for me because I've worked ever since I was 16,” Crist told the Globe. “I have never been without a job.”

Wu and daughter are hard to miss

From Congress to campaign stops, mayor often brings her baby along

Mira Wu Pearsaki was just over 2 weeks old when she held her first press conference. Curled against her mother's chest, she wore a mauve pink onesie adorned with tiny white hearts. It was Mayor Michelle Wu's first day back at work in person after giving birth Jan. 13, and she was talking to reporters about the news of the day. Mira, eyes scrunched tight, tiny head on Wu's shoulder, slept through it all. Wu broke barriers as the first woman and person of color elected to lead City Hall and shattered another this year when she became the first Boston mayor to give birth while in office, joining a small but growing cadre of women politicians to do so. She declined to take maternity leave — a benefit she fought to make available to nearly all city employees — pointing to the unique responsibilities of her job, and the privilege, resources, and flexibility she has that make it possible for her to lead the city with a newborn. Her approach has taken that well-worn political cliché — politician kisses baby — and flipped it on its head. Now, it's the politician who has the baby everyone wants to snuggle. At community events, City Hall staff meetings, senior centers, and campaign stops, more often than not Mira is there in Wu's arms. At a mere 7 weeks old, Mira even made a splash on the national stage, when photographers captured photos of Wu breastfeeding her under a

Unease on campus at Trump's demands

Even Harvard critics say Washington's gone too far

By Hilary Burns

With tension and anticipation mounting over how Harvard University will respond to the extraordinary demands by the Trump administration to combat antisemitism on campus, some high-profile Jewish students and alumni who have been critical of the school say the president has gone too far in his pressure campaign.

On Friday, Harvard leaders did not indicate how they would respond to the administration's threats to cut off some of the billions in federal funding it receives unless it adopts extensive changes in the name of combating antisemitism, including cooperating with immigration authorities and ending all diversity programs. But other prominent voices on campus expressed concerns President Trump's demand

Blowback is swift as tariffs roil markets

Beijing vows to raise levy; Powell sounds warning

By Tony Romm
NEW YORK TIMES

Two days after President Trump announced his expansive global tariffs, the United States confronted wide-ranging and painful blowback, as China retaliated against US goods and markets plummeted again on worries of a persistent, damaging trade war. No portion of the global economy appeared unscathed as the world braced for Trump to begin imposing his nearly across-the-board taxes on imports Saturday, marking the first salvo in a potentially costly trade conflict that the president has vigorously defended. China, which Trump has already hit with 20 percent tariffs, announced plans to retaliate. Beijing promised to impose a 34 percent tariff on US goods next week, including on agricultural products. China calibrated its tariffs to match Trump's decision to add a 34 percent tax to Chinese imports. The tit-for-tat delivered a huge blow to financial markets, as Wall Street reckoned with the
