Judge: Trump team ignored orders

Justice Dept. official says court's writings on deportation heeded

A federal judge on Monday questioned whether the Trump administration ignored his orders to turn around planes carrying deportees to El Salvador in possible violation of a decision he had issued minutes before. District Judge James E. Boasberg was incredulous over the administration's contentions that his verbal directions did not count, that only his written order needed to be followed, that it couldn't apply to flights outside the U.S. and that they could not answer his questions about the trips due to national security issues. "That's one heck of a stretch, I think," Boasberg replied, noting that the administration knew as the planes were departing that he was holding a hearing on whether to halt deportations being made under a rarely used 18th-century law invoked by Trump. "I'm just asking how you think my equitable powers do not attach to a plane that has departed the U.S., even if it's in international airspace," Boasberg added at another point. Deputy Associate Attorney General Abhishek Kambli contended that only Boasberg's short written order, issued about 45 minutes after he made the verbal demand, counted. It did not contain any demands to reverse planes, and Kambli added that it was too late to redirect two planes that had left the U.S. by that time. "These are sensitive, operational tasks of national security," Kambli said.

Study: Truck pollution limit would save lives

Stricter rule would prevent 500 deaths a year in Chicago region, reduce asthma, scientists find

By Nara Schoenberg

Switching to stricter California-style limits on truck emissions would prevent 500 deaths per year in the greater Chicago region by 2050, according to a new study from Northwestern University. The study also found that 600 new childhood asthma cases would be prevented each year by 2050, and that neighborhoods with higher percentages of Black and Latino residents would see the greatest health benefits. "It does show that we can do better," said lead author Victoria Lang. "And we can do better in such a way that not only are we preventing premature loss of life, but also just making cleaner and more equitable neighborhoods." The Northwestern study, accepted for publication in the journal Frontiers of Earth Science, looked at the health impact of California's Advanced Clean Trucks rule, which is currently under consideration by the Illinois Pollution Control Board. The Clean Trucks rule would require that manufacturers of medium and heavy-duty trucks slowly ramp up the number of zero-emissions vehicles sold to

Big Tech's AI pitch seeks license to steal

OpenAI, Google claim national security depends on their ability to take copyrighted content from news organizations, others

Tribune Publishing

OpenAI and Google, having long trained their ravenous bots on the work of newsrooms like this one, now want to throw out long-established copyright law by arguing, we kid you not, that the only way for the United States to defeat the Chinese Communist Party is for those tech giants to steal the content created with the sweat equity of America's human journalists.

"With a Chinese Communist Party determined to overtake us by 2030," OpenAI wrote last week to the federal Office of Science and Technology Policy, "the Trump administration's new action plan can ensure that American-led A.I. built on democratic principles can prevail over CCP-built, autocratic, authoritarian AI."

Built on democratic principles? More like built on outright theft.

That's why news organizations, including this one and The New York Times, have sued OpenAI and its partner Microsoft over their breaking copyright law by vacuuming up millions of newspaper articles without permission or payment, constituting copyright infringement on a colossal scale.

Now OpenAI comes back with the absurd argument that this was somehow necessary for national security.

In its letter, Sam Altman's crew added a whole lot of obfuscating, self-serving blather about "scaling human ingenuity" and "freedom of learning and knowledge" while describing the innovations of ChatGPT as part of some great and glorious trajectory from domesticated horses to

State's attorney sets new tone in her first 100 days

In one-on-one, O'Neill Burke talks gun rules, electronic monitoring

By Madeline Buckley
Chicago Tribune

As a media scrum gathered last week on the first floor of the Leighton Criminal Court Building after a detention hearing for a suspect in the high-profile Hadiya Pendleton case, Cook County State's Attorney Eileen O'Neill Burke made an appearance joining the prosecutor on the case to talk about the hearing's outcome.

Though her administrative offices are in the Loop, O'Neill

Burke said she often works at the busy main courthouse on the city's Southwest Side a few days a week. "There's an energy to this building," she said. "You walk in and you can feel the buzz." After several months in office, the new top prosecutor is forging her routines, making some moves typical of new administrations, such as increasing visibility at local courthouses and reorganizing some of the office's structures. But as she stepped into her role, she also quickly set a different tone, calling Chicago's gun violence problem "war zone numbers" and pledging in her swearing-in
