KEMI: NET ZERO BY 2050 IMPOSSIBLE

Tory leader to break cross-party consensus on climate change and warn current targets will make us poorer

KEMI Badenoch is poised to ditch a legal commitment to reach Net Zero by 2050, saying hitting the target is 'impossible'.

In a major speech today, the Conservative Party leader will say that drastically cutting carbon emissions cannot be achieved without bankrupting the country or hitting living standards.

She will seek to put clear blue water between her party and Labour, blasting Energy Secretary Ed Miliband for spending 'all of his time serving up dollops of lofty rhetoric'.

But Mrs Badenoch also risks angering swathes of Tories as she takes aim at her predecessors for putting the Net Zero emissions target into law.

In 2019, the UK became the first major economy to pass legislation requiring it to bring all greenhouse gas emissions to Net Zero by 2050. It means any emissions must be balanced by schemes to offset an equivalent amount of greenhouse gases from the atmosphere - from planting trees or using carbon capture.

But Mrs Badenoch will say today that there has 'never, ever been a detailed plan' to meet the target.

The goal is a 'multi-trillion, 30-year project touching every single aspect of our lives', she
