

Tumult at CDC may bode ill for U.S. health

Funding cuts, departures undercut mission and cloud future of vaccines

BY LENA H. SUN,
LAUREN WEBER
AND DAVID OVALLE

Senior officials resigned this past week from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, revolting against efforts to upend U.S. vaccine policy that they warned could lead to resurgences of preventable disease. But months of upheaval at the agency have already undercut its work to shield Americans from harm, officials and public health experts said, with the worst possibly yet to come.

Under the Trump administration, the agency has slashed billions in funding, shed hundreds of employees and rolled back programs to help Americans quit smoking and to prevent infant and maternal deaths, including support for monitoring sudden unexpected infant deaths. Funding for programs to prevent drowning, youth violence and sexual assault is in limbo, while they are under review by the U.S. DOGE Service.

The consequences of some of these cuts have been muted or delayed because they have yet to take effect or have been halted by courts. But public health workers and experts say the CDC's troubles could grow worse as the agency loses career staff who could intervene. And they say a bigger crisis in credibility is already unfolding.

"I never have seen an instance of an advanced, affluent country with among the finest scientific resources and leaders in the world be under assault, not from small pockets of the public or

A Mexican city whose people are disappearing

BY MARY BETH SHERIDAN
IN GUADALAJARA, MEXICO

He was 27 and unemployed, with a new baby boy. Daniel Velasco Carrillo was trying to make a few bucks that Tuesday morning in 2022, washing windshields at a traffic intersection, when his mother drove past.

Carmen Lucía Carrillo spotted her son immediately. Daniel was dressed in black, stretching his lanky frame over the cars, squirting soapy liquid. Handsome and outgoing, with a gap-toothed grin, he always did like to look sharp, even with a rag dangling from his back pocket. She had just bought him those jeans, from a trendy Mexican discount store, Beware of the Dog.

Carmen Lucía Carrillo saw her son Daniel minutes before he was abducted in 2022. She fears he was taken by a drug cartel.

A half-hour later, Daniel vanished. Two men — one carrying a pistol — grabbed him and shoved him into the back of a blue SUV with tinted windows.

Disappearances such as Daniel's were once rare in Mexico. Then, 15 years ago, they began to flare into global news, with the discovery of mass graves filled with putrefying bodies. Now more than 132,000 people are missing. In the first investigation of its kind, a U.N. committee is studying whether Mexicans are being disappeared "in a generalized or systematic way" — with the connivance of the government.

Trump's go-to tool at risk in court loss

TARIFF SETBACK MAY HOBBLE HIS AGENDA

Supreme Court reversal is far from assured

BY JACOB BOGAGE
AND EMILY DAVIES

President Donald Trump has used the threat of tariffs as a bargaining chip with foreign leaders, counted on their revenue to raise trillions of dollars and even wielded them as part of an effort to head off international conflicts.

That could all be over for now. A federal appeals court late Friday held that Trump does not have the authority to use emergency economic powers to impose taxes on imports, finding that power lies squarely with Congress or within existing frameworks to investigate trade imbalances.

The ruling is a major setback for the White House and it threatens to stall much of Trump's second-term agenda. Trump has described tariffs as "the most beautiful word in the dictionary" and asserted that imposing the duties — which are most often paid by U.S. consumers or businesses, not foreign producers or nations as he often suggests — will "Make America Rich, Strong, and Powerful Again."

The tariffs, he has said, would offset the cost of his "One Big Beautiful Bill," the massive tax and immigration package that congressional bookkeepers say will add $4.1 trillion to the national debt over the next decade. The nonpartisan Congressional Budget

DOJ attorneys reassigned to new working group all resign

BY PERRY STEIN

In the first weeks of the current Trump administration, Justice Department officials gave a select group of top senior career attorneys a choice: They could either quit or go to a newly created Sanctuary Cities Enforcement working group.

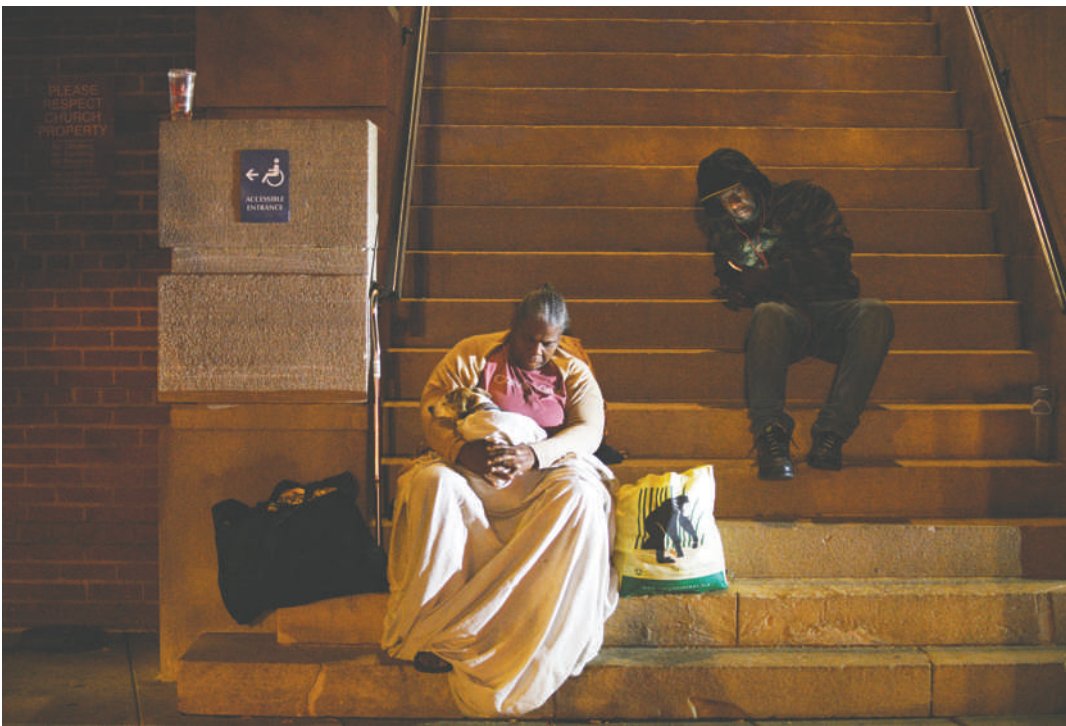

About a dozen lawyers from high-profile sections including the civil rights and national security divisions agreed to the transfer, jumping into an area most had no experience with but knew was one of the department's top priorities.

Six months later, all of those attorneys have left the DOJ for good, the last one packing up this past week. And five people familiar with the working group say they got the impression the task force was designed to do nothing but frustrate and eventually force out lawyers the administration felt it could replace with people more loyal to the president.

A Department of Justice spokesman declined to comment.

The working group's name may have suggested its members would be helping to challenge sanctuary policies, which municipalities use to limit or

D.C.'s homeless confront familiar ordeal

Trump-led crackdown on camps 'just more of the same' for many

The lights of half a dozen police cars bounced off buildings and the faces of 50 or so homeless adults as federal and D.C. officers lined up outside New York Avenue Presbyterian Church two blocks east of the White House.

Joyce Baucom leaned on her metal cane, knees still unsteady from a double replacement years earlier, and ducked under a tree to shelter from the rain.

Her 5-year-old Chihuahua-pit bull mix, Lil Mama, barked at nearby police officers until her body quaked.

Baucom and her 40-year-old son have been living on the streets for about a year, most recently near the church, a longtime safe harbor that serves the nearly 800 people living unsheltered on the streets of the nation's capital,

Longtime U.S. tax rule ends, snarling commerce globally

BY JACLYN PEISER
AND AARON GREGG

Consumers, shippers and small businesses at home and abroad are in flux as an exemption that allowed low-cost goods to enter the United States duty-free came to an end.

For nearly a century, the de minimis rule allowed merchandise worth $800 or less to bypass import tax. But it expired at 12:01 a.m. Friday, meaning such shipments are now subject to an additional 10 to 50 percent levy that coincides with the tariff rate of the country of origin, or a flat rate of $80 to $200, depending on which option the merchant chooses.

The change has caused widespread uncertainty over how the levies will be collected. President Donald Trump's July 30 executive order states that transportation carriers have to collect the tax from merchants before arriving in the U.S. using a third-party service preapproved by U.S. Customs and Border Protection. As of midday Friday, only a dozen service providers had been certified to collect and pay such duties.

More than two dozen countries — including several European nations, Japan and Taiwan — have suspended some shipments to the U.S. until they sort out a system to collect the duties. That's prompted some overseas businesses to

Under Ukrainian occupation, one Russian family's path to survival

BY FRANCESCA EBEL

KURSK, RUSSIA — Antonina and Anatoly Loginov squinted in the bright dawn light as they emerged from the basement where they'd been holed up for weeks. They took in the shattered moonscape of their village, Gueyvo, three miles from the border with Ukraine.

In the seven months of Ukraine's occupation and Russia's fierce campaign to recapture the territory, not a single building was left standing; the Loginovs had lost everything.

Russian forces were still weeks away from securing the surrounding area, and the couple's son Vitaly had risked everything to get there and rescue his parents.
