

Disputed housing tower shelved

Mayor seeks new ideas for Davis Square

A plan to build a 500-unit, 26-story apartment building in Davis Square had been controversial from the outset, as residents balked at the idea of a high rise emerging in the low-slung area and altering the makeup of an eclectic neighborhood forever.

Now, it's dead.

Andrew Flynn and his real estate firm Copper Mill said Monday they are no longer pursuing their grand plans for a residential tower, leaving the future of a Somerville crossroads that includes arts, dining, and nightlife stalwarts to be decided another day.

"We will not be proceeding with our housing development in Davis Square," Flynn said in a letter to a local business association Monday, in which he attributed the project's implosion to a chilly reception from the city.

Flynn, in a statement, described the project's failure to get off the ground as a loss for Somerville and blamed local government for not lending it the help it could have used as it pressed its case to Somervilians.

Haitians look to Canada for jobs

TPS shift creates Mass. shortage

Jude fled the humanitarian crisis in Haiti and arrived in Boston three years ago. At first, with gunshots no longer going off around him, he felt safe.

But in July, when the US Supreme Court allowed the Trump administration to revoke the temporary protected status of Haitian migrants, Jude feared he'd be deported, despite his pending asylum application. So he left to join his mother in Quebec, where French is the official language, as it is in Haiti (along with Haitian Creole), and there is a large Haitian community.

Jude, 46, is among a wave of Haitian migrants fleeing north to Canada following the termination of their legal status. It's unclear exactly how many have left, but Haitians have made more asylum claims at the Canadian land border this year than citizens of any other country, according to the Canada Border Services Agency.

Senate rivals challenge voters to tune in

KEN MCGAGH FOR THE BOSTON GLOBE

Senator Ed Markey and his challenger, Representative Seth Moulton, have criss-crossed the state on campaign stops the last few days. On Monday, Markey (left) held an election eve rally in Titus Sparrow Park in the South End, and Moulton and his family ordered lunch at a Vietnamese bakery in Boston.

Markey and Moulton seek to inject a dose of enthusiasm into their showdown

The outcome of Massachusetts' Democratic Senate primary, which winds to a close on Tuesday, may hinge on whether it's hit with a late injection of something the race has so far lacked.

Urgency.

Since the beginning of the race, Democratic voters have largely been tuned out of the contest between incumbent Senator Ed Markey, of Malden, and challenger Seth Moulton, the congressman from Salem.

The choices haven't exactly galvanized primary voters. In a moment of generational upheaval for Democrats, many have been uneasy about sending the 80-year old Markey back to Washington for another six-year term. But they also seem unconvinced that Moulton will be the rock-solid progressive they want — even though there is not much daylight between the two contenders on policy.

The stakes haven't galvanized, either.

With Democrats desperate to counter Trump in the Senate by defeating Republicans elsewhere in the midterms, the importance of a blue-state primary has seemed comparatively minor.

Both candidates have been making their cases around the state. As Markey bets it all on consolidating the most engaged of the core party base, Moulton is counting on a groundswell of support from outside the usual corners — which would require generating strong voter turnout.

That's where the sense of urgency comes in — a feeling Moulton and his team were working hard to generate at his final big pre-primary rally on Saturday afternoon. On a sun-drenched Lynn Common, Moulton mingled with voters and families alongside big banners with his closing slogan: "Our fight can't wait."

Asked by the Globe if voters see the same need for change he does, Moulton said, "it's what I hear all over the place."

Richie's slush hits sweet milestone

EVERETT — Richie Cardillo Jr. remembers the long line of customers that trailed out of his father's store.

As the owner of Richie's Classic Italian Slush and his late father's successor, Cardillo found his life shaped by selling the sweet slush found in corner stores and carnival-colored carts across New England.

"It's all I know. This is what I grew up in," Cardillo, 62, said. "I grew up in a family business where there was no choice but to work."

This year marks the 70th anniversary of Richie's Classic Italian Slush. At first glance, it's easy to assume the business, whose only brick-and-mortar shop sits on the traffic-

Don't take GLP-1s? Be prepared to explain yourself.

BETH TEITELL

We've reached peak hypocrisy. In simpler times — like maybe yesterday — here's how the judgment went: Use one of the new miracle weight-loss drugs and get shamed for taking the easy way out. For cheating your way into a thinness you don't deserve.

But now? A whole new group is being judged, too. If the world thinks your body is too large, and you're not using a GLP-1, well, be prepared to explain yourself.

"We have spent years trying to remove shame from obesity treatment," said Sarah Isenberg, a certified health and nutrition coach in Boston. "We should be careful not to replace it with this strange new form of pressure."

Uh, it looks like it's already too late.

Just ask Traci Finkel, 37, an executive assistant at Boston Children's Hospital, who's been dealing with pressure to lose weight since childhood, when her sister was taken bikini shopping while her outing was to Weight Watchers.

"It's almost like people are in a cult," she said of those using GLP-1s. "The drugs are [messing] with people's minds. It reminds me a lot of the diet pills in the '80s. Just do this easy thing, and you don't have to do anything else."
