A first under RFK Jr., move may be followed by hepatitis B vaccine vote

BY LENA H. SUN
AND PAIGE WINFIELD CUNNINGHAM

ATLANTA — Federal vaccine advisers voted Thursday to roll back a childhood vaccine recommendation, marking the first change to the routine immunization schedule under Health and Human Services Secretary Robert F. Kennedy Jr., who is helming a broad review of vaccines he has maligned for years.

In an 8-3 vote, with one member abstaining, the 12-member Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices handpicked by Kennedy recommended skipping a combination measles, mumps, rubella and chicken pox vaccine — given to about 15 percent of children — until a child is at least 4. The combination vaccine — which is different from the measles, mumps and rubella vaccine that children more commonly receive — has typically been administered to children between 12 and 15 months of age.

The panel recommended that children under 4 get separate vaccines — one against measles, mumps and rubella (MMR) and another for chicken pox.

The recommendation now goes to the acting head of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, who will decide whether to make it the official government recommendation.

The recommendation capped a meeting marked by confusion over what information the panel was being presented at times. At one point, some members asked what they had just voted on.

The panel also appears poised to eliminate a 34-year-old recommendation for all infants to receive a hepatitis B vaccine at birth, instead delaying shots until most infants are 1 month old. Advisers discussed the change on

Push to police speech breaks with GOP’s typical rhetoric

A week after the fatal shooting of Charlie Kirk, President Donald Trump and his allies are attacking critics of the right-wing activist who they say have gone too far, a campaign that detractors described as an alarming attempt to curtail one of the nation’s most hallowed civil liberties: freedom of expression.

Vice President JD Vance urged supporters to drum those “celebrating Charlie’s murder” out of their jobs and said the administration may strip tax-free status from two prominent foundations he accused of underwriting a “disgusting article” about Kirk. The State Department embarked on a global effort to identify foreign citizens “praising, rationalizing, or making light of” Kirk’s death and put them on a list to prevent them from ever receiving U.S. visas. Attorney General Pam Bondi vowed a sweeping crackdown on “hate speech.”

300 new offices for surge by ICE

EXPANSION SPARKS RUSH TO FIND SPACE

Agency needs worksites for thousands of hires

BY HANNAH NATANSON
AND ROBERT KLEMKO

Immigration and Customs Enforcement is seeking new office spaces in hundreds of locations across the United States to support plans to hire thousands of lawyers and immigration enforcement officers, according to six federal officials familiar with the matter and records obtained by The Washington Post.

The office spaces are being sought on ICE’s behalf by the General Services Administration, the agency responsible for managing federal real estate, according to the officials and the records. In recent weeks, high-level staffers with ICE approached the GSA and said the government needed to secure roughly 300 office sites nationwide as fast as possible, in a bid to house more than 10,000 new employees, the officials and the records show.

The GSA has formed special planning teams to facilitate ICE’s expansion, according to the officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to describe internal personnel matters they were not authorized to discuss publicly. Records obtained by The Post show there are now standing meetings within the GSA to discuss the “ICE Surge.”

ICE has said it plans to hire more than 10,000 immigration officers, as well as additional lawyers to prosecute removal cases. Those staffers will be located at offices across the country, some in red cities and red states, including in the South and the Midwest, according to one federal official with direct

Lawsuit: Bias and greed corrupt organ transplants

Financial incentives risked patient safety, whistleblower alleges

BY PETER WHORISKEY

In early 2020, a director of the kidney transplant program at Parkland Health in Dallas noticed a problem. Patients were languishing on the waiting list for donated kidneys. One patient, he said, had waited nine years for a kidney transplant, and by that time he had become too sick for the procedure. Others died waiting.

“No one should have to wait that long,” he said in a recent interview.

He told hospital executives at the time that the delays arose because organs intended for patients at Parkland, which serves a disproportionate share of poor people, were being redirected to patients at nearby UT Southwestern Medical Center, a prestigious academic hospital caring for a more affluent population.

“I observed Parkland patients get passed over and the same organs go to patients at UT Southwestern,” said the program director, Patrek Chase. “This forced many of our patients to continue long-term dialysis while languishing on the transplant wait list.”

According to a presentation Chase made to hospital executives in early 2020 that The Washington Post reviewed, at least 36 times in the previous year, kidneys had become available to Parkland patients, but the transplants didn’t happen because doctors said there was a problem with the donated organ. Evaluating and rejecting donated organs is a normal part of the transplant process. But in those 36 cases, doctors subsequently transplanted the same organ into a patient at UT Southwestern Medical Center, he said.

The allegations are part of a wide-ranging whistleblower lawsuit brought by Chase, an industry veteran with 15 years experience at transplant centers and organ procurement groups, who said the way the United States collects and distributes life-saving organs has been corrupted by greed, lax oversight and methods designed to maximize payments

While Sulma Martinez is in detention, her twin daughters Yolani, left, and Loany are in a government shelter hundreds of miles away.

Deportations drive a new wave of family breakups

Some migrant parents are given a choice: Leave with your children or face separation

BY MARIA SACCHETTI

METAIRIE, LA. — Sulma Martinez had just left the dentist’s office with her 14-year-old twin daughters when an unmarked U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement vehicle pulled up behind her and flashed its blue lights. The officers asked for her papers.

Martinez, a 35-year-old originally from Honduras, had a work permit, a pending asylum claim and a pathway to a visa for crime victims. But none of that mattered, she said the officers told her.

They gave her a choice: She could head to a hotel and be deported with her daughters, or she could contest her removal and try to stay in the United States. If she chose the latter, she’d be arrested and the twins would be sent to a shelter for child immigrants.

“We were crying. We were scared,” Martinez said. “I didn’t want them to separate me from my girls.”

As President Donald Trump’s mass deportation campaign ramps up, ICE has sharply increased the number of migrant children it is sending to federal shelters for unaccompanied minors. Officers have referred more than 400 children nationwide to shelters run by the Office of Refugee Resettlement since Trump took office, according to two people who have reviewed internal records. While some allegedly were removed from dangerous situations, many were separated from parents, relatives or government-vetted sponsors as part of immigration enforcement actions.

ICE officials disputed that information and said its referrals are not that high. But the agency and ORR did not provide the data.

The separations recall the “zero tolerance” policy Trump implemented along the southern border during his first term, which led to the forced separation of more than 4,000 newly
