Court lifts reins in immigration case

Justices void order that limited basis for agents' stops in LA

By Lindsay Whitehurst
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Monday cleared the way for federal agents to conduct sweeping immigration operations for now in Los Angeles, the latest victory for President Donald Trump's administration at the high court.

The conservative majority lifted a restraining order from a judge who found that roving patrols were conducting indiscriminate stops in and around LA. The order had barred immigration agents from stopping people solely based on their race, language, job or location. The court's 6-3 decision followed a pattern of at least temporarily allowing some of the Republican administration's harshest policies, while leaving room for the possibility of a different outcome after the legal case plays out fully. The net effect, meanwhile, has Trump pushing ahead in many of the areas he considers most critical.

The majority did not explain its reasoning, as is typical on the court's emergency docket. But Justice Brett Kavanaugh said the lower-court judge had gone too far in restricting how Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents can carry out brief stops for questioning. "The prospect of such after-the-fact judicial second-guessing and contempt proceedings will inevitably chill

White House: 'Blitz' to start in Chicago

Immigration enforcement operation to target 'criminal illegal aliens,' Homeland Security says

President Donald Trump's Department of Homeland Security announced Monday it is beginning a surge of immigration law enforcement in Chicago, dubbing it "Operation Midway Blitz" and claiming it will target "criminal illegal aliens" who have taken advantage of the city and state's sanctuary policies.

The announcement comes more than two weeks after the Republican president began to say he was planning to target Chicago over crime, causing Democratic Gov. JB Pritzker and Mayor Brandon Johnson to caution residents to prepare for potential immigration sweeps.

"For years, Governor (JB) Pritzker and his fellow sanctuary politicians released Tren de Aragua gang members, rapists, kidnappers, and drug traffickers on Chicago's streets — putting American lives at risk and making Chicago a magnet for criminals," said Tricia McLaughlin, DHS assistant secretary. "President Trump and Secretary (Kristi) Noem have a clear message: No city is a safe haven for criminal illegal aliens. If you come to our country illegally and break our laws, we will hunt you down, arrest you, deport you, and you will never return."

Pritzker, the state's two-term Democratic governor and vociferous critic of the Republican president, took to the social platform X to contend the ICE surge "isn't about fighting crime."

"That requires support and coordination — yet we've experienced nothing like that over the past several weeks," he wrote. "Instead of taking steps to work

Hunt for 2 escaped horses ends badly

Incident threatened equestrian village's biggest industry

By Bob Goldsborough

A case of two runaway horses in Wayne — which sparked a multiday horse hunt that ended with the death of both horses — is drawing criticism from some residents of the west suburban village over how many aspects of the search were handled.

The situation illustrates how even with the best of intentions, horse owners' efforts to rescue unwanted horses facing uncertain futures can go awry, with tragic consequences.

It also marks the latest high-profile shooting death of an animal in the equestrian-oriented village of 2,300 residents, which straddles the DuPage County-Kane County line.

The saga began in mid-August, when a Wayne resident, whose family runs an equestrian facility in St. Charles, purchased two rescue horses from Southern Wisconsin Second Chance Lot, an organization that offers people the ability to acquire horses that otherwise might be sent to slaughter.

Although the family has a long history of working with horses, this was their first effort acquiring rescue horses, said Wayne resident Kelly Owens, a certified volunteer "approved humane investigator" for the state Department of Agriculture who assisted in the search. The rescue horses' owners did not respond to requests for comment.

Case referrals to restorative justice courts lag

Gun possession cases no longer sent there by state's attorney

Last summer, Kendall Robinson was in his car when his parking job drew the attention of south suburban police officers, according to Robinson and court records.

When the officers approached, they found a pistol, records show. And though Robinson said he had a firearm owners identification card, he did not have a concealed carry license, so he was arrested.

"I didn't need that on me," said Robinson, who has a baby daughter. "I didn't need that record."

After a year of hard work in a Cook County restorative justice court, Robinson will likely avoid that gun arrest marring his record, but he is among a dwindling population of gun offenders working toward a second chance in community courts that seek to offer a gentler version of justice.

Making good on a campaign promise, State's Attorney Eileen O'Neill Burke has stopped approving gun possession cases for participation in the court, instead sending other types of offenses, such as retail theft, burglary and criminal damage to property.

Burke's office says the move is in line with her oft-stated concerns: "For us, it's guns, guns, guns. Every single day," said Yvette Loizon, chief of policy at the state's attorney's office.

And in response to Tribune questions about the shift, Loizon pointed out that the office has sought to address cases like Robinson's when Burke lobbied for a state law that makes it easier, in certain cases, for people who have
