

PRESIDENT TRUMP and Russian President Vladimir Putin meet at a U.S. air base on Friday in Anchorage.

Trump, Putin have ‘productive’ summit but provide no details

U.S. president says it’s up to Ukraine to decide on a deal in Russia’s war

By MICHAEL WILNER

ANCHORAGE — Three hours of negotiations with Vladimir Putin over Russia’s war in Ukraine were “extremely productive,” but only Kyiv can decide whether a deal toward a ceasefire is possible, President Trump said Friday, capping a historic summit with the Russian leader.

At a news conference at a U.S. air base in Alaska, the two men alluded to agreements made, but offered no details and took no questions. “We didn’t get there,” Trump said.

“I believe we had a very productive meeting. There were many, many points that we agreed on,” Trump said. “There’s no deal until there’s a deal. I will call up NATO in a little while. I will call up various people.

“It’s ultimately up to them,” he added.

Standing alongside

Trump, Putin warned Europe not to “torpedo the nascent progress” of “the agreement that we’ve reached.”

“We’re convinced that, in order to make the settlement last in the long term, we have to eliminate all the primary roots, the primary causes of the conflict,” Putin said. “Naturally, the security of Ukraine should be ensured as well.”

The talks were the first high-level negotiations in Russia’s years-long military campaign, a war of conquest that has resulted in Europe’s bloodiest conflict since World War II.

Trump had said before the summit he would know if Putin was serious about peace within minutes of their meeting. Yet, before the talks began, the Russian leader, a global pariah since launching his full-scale invasion of Ukraine three years ago, received a red carpet ar-

[See Summit, A6]

Home Depots at ‘epicenter’ of recent ICE raids

By JENNY JARVIE

While the number of immigration raids in Southern California have slowed in recent weeks, the focus on Home Depots appears to have intensified.

Parking lots at those stores have become a key new battleground in the federal government’s evolving strategy of immigration enforcement.

“Home Depot, whether they like it or not, they are the epicenter of raids,” said Pablo Alvarado, the co-executive director of the National Day Laborer Organizing Network, a group that represents the tens of thousands of day laborers working in L.A.

On Thursday, agents moved on a Home Depot parking lot in Monrovia, sending laborers running, including a man who jumped a wall and onto the 210 Freeway, where he was fatally struck. A day prior, fear of a possible raid at a Ladera Ranch location sparked warnings across social media.

Since a federal judge issued a temporary restraining order prohibiting federal agents from targeting people solely based on their race, language, vocation or location, the number of arrests in Southern California declined in July.

But over the last two weeks, some higher-profile raids have returned, often taking place at Home Depot locations, where immigrant laborers congregate looking for work.

The renewed burst of raids outside neighborhood

[See Raids, A9]

Anger over death

Man dies after fleeing immigration raid at a Home Depot in Monrovia. CALIFORNIA, B1

BORDER PATROL agents march to Edward R. Roybal Federal Building in L.A.

U.S. show of force raising fear, pushing norms in ‘blue’ cities

By HANNAH FRY, GRACE TOOHEY AND RICHARD WINTON

In downtown Los Angeles, Gov. Gavin Newsom was holding a news conference with Democratic leaders when the Border Patrol showed up nearby to conduct a showy immigration raid.

In Washington, D.C., hundreds of National Guard troops patrolled the streets, some in armored vehicles, as city officials battled with the White House over whether the federal government can take control of the local police department.

Trump actions in big cities

JUNE

- Deploys thousands of National Guard troops and Marines to Southern California

AUGUST

- Names himself chair of a new security commission for 2028 L.A. Olympics
- Deploys 800 troops and others to nation’s capital

President Trump has long demonized “blue” cities such as Los Angeles, Washington and New York, frequently claiming — often contrary to evidence — that Democratic leaders have allowed crime and blight to worsen. Trump cited out-of-control crime as the reason for his Washington, D.C., guard deployment, even though data show that crime in the city is down.

But over the last few months, Trump’s rhetoric has given way to searing images of federal power on urban streets that are generating both headlines and increasing alarm in some circles.

[See Norms, A9]

Democrats reveal plan for redistricting

California’s majority party releases maps as fight against Trump and Texas escalates.

By LAURA J. NELSON AND SEEMA MEHTA

A decade and a half after California voters stripped lawmakers of the ability to draw the boundaries of congressional districts, Gov. Gavin Newsom and fellow Democrats are pushing to take that partisan power back.

The redistricting plan taking shape in Sacramento and headed toward voters in November could shift the Golden State’s political landscape for at least six years, if not longer, and sway which party controls the U.S. House of Representatives after the 2026 midterm elections — which will be pivotal to the fate of President Trump’s political agenda.

What Golden State voters choose to do will reverberate nationwide, killing some political careers and launching others, provoking other states to reconfigure their own congressional districts and boosting Newsom’s profile as a top Trump nemesis and leader of the nation’s Democratic resistance.

The new maps, drawn by Democratic strategists and lawmakers behind closed doors, were submitted to legislative leaders by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee on Friday. They are expected to appear on a Nov. 4 special election ballot, along with a constitutional amendment that would override the state’s voter-approved, independent redistricting commission.

The changes would ripple across hundreds of miles of California, from the forests near the Oregon state line through the deserts of Death Valley and Palm Springs to the U.S.-Mexico border, expanding Democrats’ grip on California and further isolating Republicans.

The proposed maps would concentrate Republican voters in a handful of deep-red districts and eliminate an Inland Empire congressional seat represented by the longest-serving member of California’s GOP delegation. For Democrats, the plans would boost the fortunes of up-and-coming politicians and shore up vul-

[See Redistricting, A7]

Satellites can help with fire detection. So can binoculars

By NOAH HAGGERTY

As California turns to satellite imagery, remote cameras watched by AI and heat detection sensors placed throughout wildlands to detect fires earlier, one Orange County group is keeping it old-school.

Whenever the National Weather Service issues a red flag warning, a sign that dangerous fire weather is imminent, Renalynn Fun-tanilla swiftly sends alerts to her more than 300 volunteers’ phones and inboxes.

She wheels TVs into a conference room turned makeshift command center, sets up computers and phones around the table and dispatches volunteers to dozens of trailheads and roadways in Orange County’s wildland-urban interface: likely spots for the county’s next devastating fire to erupt.

The volunteers — sporting bright yellow vests and navy blue hats with an “Orange County Fire Watch” emblem — slap large fire watch magnets to the sides of their vehicles, grab some binoculars and start to watch.

Amid California’s coastal sage scrub and chaparral ecosystems that are plagued with frequent fast-moving fires, preventing ignitions and stamping out fires before they become unmanageable is the name of the game.

To do it, Orange County Fire Watch is betting on good Samaritans teaching the public how to prevent ignitions and keeping an eye out for potential culprits, from overheating e-bikes to arsonists. (In Orange County, human-operated equipment has historically been responsible for about 34% of wildfires documented

[See Fires, A14]

A-TEAM EARNED AN F

A 1960s program sought to recruit 20,000 high school athletes to harvest summer crops. Gustavo Arellano writes of its failure. CALIFORNIA, B1

Floods in India, Pakistan kill 280

Helicopter carrying relief supplies crashes because of bad weather, killing all five people on board. WORLD, A3

Weather

Mostly sunny. L.A. Basin: 80/65. B8

Markets A12

Opinion Voices A13

Public adjusters bill scrutinized

Critic says measure may make it less likely for fire victims to get help. BUSINESS, A10

For the latest news, go to latimes.com.

7 85944 00200 5

DODGERS, PADRES LOVE TO HATE EACH OTHER

By JACK HARRIS

Three years later, the quote still resonates.

When it comes to the Dodgers and the San Diego Padres, late Padres owner Peter Seidler framed the dynamic best.

“The Dodgers are the dragon up the freeway we’re trying to slay,” Seidler said in August 2022, during an in-game interview with ESPN as the two teams played a “Sunday Night Baseball” game at Chavez Ravine.

“We have a lot of respect for them, obviously. But our goal, and San Diego knows this as well, is to win a championship.”

And from that pursuit, one of baseball’s most heated modern rivalries has sprouted.

To the rest of the baseball world, the Padres have been a plucky feel-good story over the last half-decade. They’re a small-market team that has become an annual postseason contender. They have an aggressive front office, a roster full of big personalities, and an ever-pulsing current of emotion and intensity reverberating from the dugout through their frenzied home crowds.

In Los Angeles, however, the perspective couldn’t be more different. The Dodgers have long been the ruling power in the

[See Rivalry, A14]