

World Cup commuters from R.I. in for long ride

Limited mass transit choices include pricey, slow bus and train with detour to Boston

By Alexa Gagosz
GLOBE STAFF

PROVIDENCE — Heading to World Cup matches at Gillette Stadium from Rhode Island this summer?

Good luck getting there. With the tournament just seven weeks away, transportation options for fans traveling from the Ocean State to Foxborough are proving to be pricey and limited, raising concerns that visitors and locals alike could face unnecessarily long travel times and steep costs to attend matches.

“It seems that at every turn, the organizational powers that be have made decisions that seem hell-bent on alienating fans,” said Providence resident Tucker Wentz.

Though the MBTA has previously run $20 round trips between Providence and Gillette for Patriots games and major concerts — including Taylor Swift’s 2023 Eras tour — the T said it won’t operate direct service from Rhode Island for the largest tournament in World Cup history.

To get to Gillette by train, fans who have already spent hundreds of dollars on soccer tickets will have to catch the commuter rail from Providence, travel 45 miles north to Boston’s South Station and then shell out $80 per seat to travel 27 miles back south to Foxborough. Capacity is limited to 20,000 customers per match.

The upshot: Riders from Providence could be commuting on trains for well over two hours each way for a trip that could be done in roughly half the time.

The other main option is a $95-per-seat bus ride, dubbed the Boston Stadium Express, in what is expected to be bumper-to-bumper traffic between Providence and the stadium.

Neither rail nor bus will offer discounted fares for children, seniors, or passengers with accessibility needs.

WORLD CUP, Page A5

For Red Sox, errors start in corner office

Explanation of Cora firing exposes troubled franchise

TARA SULLIVAN

BALTIMORE — The Red Sox don’t lead the majors in much these days, but give them this: They can do performative solemnity with the best of them.

No wonder, given how good they’ve gotten at needing it.

In a here-we-go-again scene that was both utterly shocking yet at the same time all too familiar, Red Sox brass put on their most serious faces as they tried, once again, to defend the indefensible, and explain the unexplainable.

This time it was a Sunday morning in Baltimore, where team president and CEO Sam Kennedy and his president of baseball operations Craig Breslow came to explain the decision to decimate the team’s coaching staff in a Saturday night massacre that axed manager Alex Cora and six of his coaches.

The two grim-faced men had plenty of offerings about underperforming players and organizational resets, and with the team’s last-place standing and abysmal performance through 27 games, you could concede that the numbers were on their side. But anyone paying attention to the Red Sox across the last decade sees through that short-sighted, knee-jerking view. This isn’t about a small sample size in the 2026 season. This is about an organization in crisis, a rudderless ship with captains who continue to insist there is a championship horizon ahead, even if they are the only ones who can see it.

SULLIVAN, Page C4

A tragedy unfolds in Wellesley

An undated photo of Ella (left) and Kai MacAusland with their mother, Janette.

Troubling encounter in Vt. leads to horrific discovery

By Sarah Rahal
GLOBE STAFF
and Lila Hempel-Edgers
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

WELLESLEY — A mother charged with killing her two young children is expected in court Monday as investigators piece together a troubling timeline that spans a quiet Wellesley street and a frantic encounter in southern Vermont, where police said she arrived at a family residence bleeding from an injury.

Janette MacAusland, 49, is accused of killing her children,

Ella and Kai MacAusland, ages 7 and 6, whose bodies were discovered Friday night inside the family’s home on Edgemoor Avenue in Wellesley, officials said.

Police in Bennington, Vt., said Sunday the case began to unfold around 9:15 p.m. Friday, when officers were asked to check on a woman who had arrived at a “family residence” in the town, “appearing highly distraught.”

Family members told police she had a visible neck injury and was bleeding.

Police identified the woman as MacAusland. During their interaction, officers became concerned about the welfare of her children and asked Wellesley police to check the family’s home. At about 9:50 p.m., officers in Massachusetts found the two children dead inside the house, authorities said.

Authorities have released few details about how the children died, and investigators have not publicly described what may have happened in the home. The

WELLESLEY, Page A5

WILLIAM LANG/ASSOCIATED PRESS

FBI officers gathered at the scene outside an address in Torrance, Calif., connected to the alleged gunman.

Gala descends into confusion

REPORTER’S NOTEBOOK

Coming out of hiding, media had same question as rest of nation: What just happened?

By Aidan Ryan
GLOBE STAFF

WASHINGTON — I didn’t know it was gunfire at first.

As I finished my salad course, I heard a loud noise to my left. Seconds later — with plates and glasses crashing and chairs scraping the floor — I saw guests at nearby tables dropping to the ground. I instantly followed, falling to my knees in a crouched position, trying to tuck my head un-

SHOOTING, Page A6

Questions of safety

Attack was just latest time president had been in danger. A7.

Rumors ricochet

Disinformation filled sites across the internet as soon as shooting ended. A6.

NATHAN HOWARD/GETTY IMAGES

Attendees ducked under tables in the ballroom during the burst of gunfire at the Washington Hilton during the correspondents dinner Saturday night.

Here, the streets do double duty as a parking lot

City shrugs while drivers jockey for running room and spots in Mattapan

By Danny McDonald
GLOBE STAFF

Each morning, a kind of dance commences on Blue Hill Avenue in Mattapan Square.

Cars, lots of cars, pull over and double-park, their hazard lights flashing. Sometimes they block in other drivers trying to get out of their parking spots. Now and then, motorists get stuck behind someone parked in the street and a bottleneck ensues.

Here, like in many neighborhoods across the city, double-parking is an accepted aspect of day-to-day life. Emphasis on accepted: Even as some elected officials and community leaders lament a lack of parking enforcement, and even as traffic regularly snarls commutes, authorities appear ambivalent about cracking down.

For all of last year, the city issued 80 parking violations for double-parking along a roughly two-block stretch of Blue Hill Avenue in the heart of the square, City of Boston data show.

Over two morning visits recently, the Globe counted more than 80 double-parked cars in the span of less than two hours. In a car-centric world, parking convenience still often trumps legality.

“There’s no enforcement,” said Fatima Ali-Salaam, chair of the Greater Mattapan Neighborhood Council.

Boston’s interim chief of streets, Nick Gove, addressed a question about parking during a council hearing this past week.

“We do enforcement across the city, year-round. We have done targeted enforcement efforts in conjunction with [Boston police] on

PARKED CARS, Page A5

