To ‘people’s pope,’ a solemn farewell

In a rite attended by the mighty and meek, Francis’s funeral draws an estimated 250,000

VATICAN CITY — The Roman Catholic Church bid farewell to the first New World pope Saturday in a funeral attended by monarchs, presidents and cardinals but also a different group of guests — an honor guard of migrants, prisoners, the homeless and transgender faithful who offered white roses to the coffin of a leader who had placed the marginalized at the heart of his “people’s papacy.”

Under crystal-clear skies in the shadow of St. Peter’s Basilica, the nearly two-hour requiem Mass was a solemn spectacle of an ancient faith, an elaborate, multilingual ceremony modestly slimmed down at the behest of Pope Francis, who died the morning after Easter at 88. The most notable difference: a single wooden coffin lined with zinc as opposed to the three-tiered caskets of cypress, lead and oak used for previous popes.

The changes, official said, were meant to honor the wishes of the first Jesuit pope, who had taken a vow of poverty and aimed to make the proceedings seem more like the funeral of a pastor than a “sovereign” who had ruled the

Judge’s arrest takes war on judiciary to new level

BY PATRICK MARLEY
AND JEREMY ROEBUCK

The escalating fight between President Donald Trump and the judiciary took a new form Friday.

After weeks of mounting questions about whether Trump was defying court orders, the administration arrested a Wisconsin judge and accused her of helping a Mexican immigrant evade arrest by federal agents.

Officers handcuffed Milwaukee County Judge Hannah Dugan in

Critics say handcuffing the Wis. jurist is an attempt to intimidate public. Attorney General Pam Bondi bragged on the Fox News show “America Reports” about the administration’s willingness to go after judges who “think they’re above the law.” FBI Director Kash Patel began the day by announcing Dugan’s arrest on social media and ended it by posting a photo of agents leading her away.

While many Republican supporters of the president cheered the aggressive actions, critics of the administration said the spectacle sent a chilling message.

“The obvious purpose of the arrest of Judge Dugan on criminal charges is to intimidate and threaten all judges, state and local, across the country,” said J. Michael Luttig, a conservative former U.S. appeals court judge.

Many scholars have dubbed the standoff between Trump and the courts a constitutional crisis.

Judges have increasingly expressed alarm at the administration’s dismissive response to orders blocking Trump’s efforts to dismantle federal programs, fire

When President Donald Trump stood in the Capitol Rotunda to deliver his second inauguration address, he made a series of proclamations and predication as he declared: “A tide of change is sweeping the country.”

Nearly 100 days after he took the oath, that much has proved unmistakably true.

He has ushered in a dramatic shift far beyond the typical changes that take place every four or eight years, even bigger than Trump himself did in 2017 when he took office the first time. He has altered in fundamental ways how the U.S. economy works, how global diplomacy is conducted, and how immigration is enforced. He is working to tear down and remake the federal bureaucracy, pushing the limits of presidential power, and waging war against the court system.

Ahead of his 100th day in office on Wednesday, Trump has a historically low approval rating and has overseen a significant drop in the stock market. Economists and consumers are expressing worry about a possible recession.

But inside the White House, there is broad agreement that Trump has laid the foundation for vast and far-reaching changes that will alter the federal government and American society. Senior administration officials are

As U.S. spurns electric cars, Beijing cornering the market

BY EVAN HALPER

Michael Bickford was excited to get behind the wheel of a Ford F-150 Lightning, but after experiencing the dismal state of the U.S. charging network on a recent road trip, the Portland, Maine, retiree reconsidered.

“I had planned to go fully electric, but I gave up on that when the realities of how difficult that would be here set in,” said Bickford, who is settling with his hybrid. After pulling his name off the list for the plug-in pickup, he’s holding out for the day the United States catches up to China. He’s in for a long wait.

China is leapfrogging the United States with the availability of more advanced, cheaper electric vehicles, while President Donald Trump is cutting subsidies and making other moves that could leave the U.S. behind. The president’s antipathy toward plug-ins, combined with the U.S. domestic auto industry’s slow rollout of new clean-energy vehicles, is frustrating U.S. motorists who hunger for clean transportation.

“You read about the cars and charging systems they are making in China and think to yourself, ‘Geez, why don’t we have that here?’” Bickford said.

Trump has declared that the Biden administration’s support for electric cars was a Marxist “hoax” that hurt U.S. autoworkers. He is freezing billions of dollars of spending on electric

Trade war enabler once decried tariffs’ ‘downward spiral’

Job struggles of his MBA students set Peter Navarro on path to steering Trump’s volatile policy

BY MICHAEL KRANISH
AND JEFF STEIN

One year ago, Peter Navarro sat in a federal prison in Miami, sending messages that he was a martyr for MAGA. He had begged for help paying legal bills that he said would reach $750,000.

Now Navarro has a prime seat in the Oval Office, where he is an architect of President Donald Trump’s tariff policy — butting against the secretaries of treasury and commerce and Elon Musk, who called him a “moron.”

Navarro’s journey to one of the most powerful positions in the White House has been one of spectacular flameouts and surprising comebacks. He tried to launch a similar tariff war in the
