The Boston Globe

Serving our community since 1872

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 2026

USRowing bans former Cape Cod coach

Restriction follows arrest on charges of child rape from time working in Mass.

By Shannon Larson and Lea Skene
GLOBE STAFF
and Bryan Hecht
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

A former girls' rowing coach on Cape Cod was banned from national competition Friday, one day after he was arrested in the Bronx on child rape charges stemming from his time in Massachusetts nearly two decades ago.

Guy K. Monseair, 57, will no longer be allowed to participate in USRowing programs or competitions in any capacity, Lizzie Seedhouse, a spokesperson for the organization, said in a statement Friday.

Monseair rose to prominence within the sport, building a reputation for delivering results-driven training, big promises, and a big personality.

Most recently, he led City Island Rowing, an all-girls competitive youth rowing team in the Bronx, according to an online profile.

He was arrested Thursday on a warrant from Barnstable police charging him with four counts of aggravated statutory rape of a child and one count of indecent assault and battery on a child under 14, police said.

Monseair was ordered held during his arraignment Friday night in New York. His next court date is Nov. 12, when Massachusetts officials can pick him up and bring him back to the state, according to the Bronx district attorney's office.

Two of the alleged rapes occurred on March 1, 2008, according to a criminal complaint. Another two alleged rapes occurred a year later, on March 1, 2009, records show.

The indecent assault and battery charge stems from an alleged incident on Sept. 1, 2007, the complaint stated.

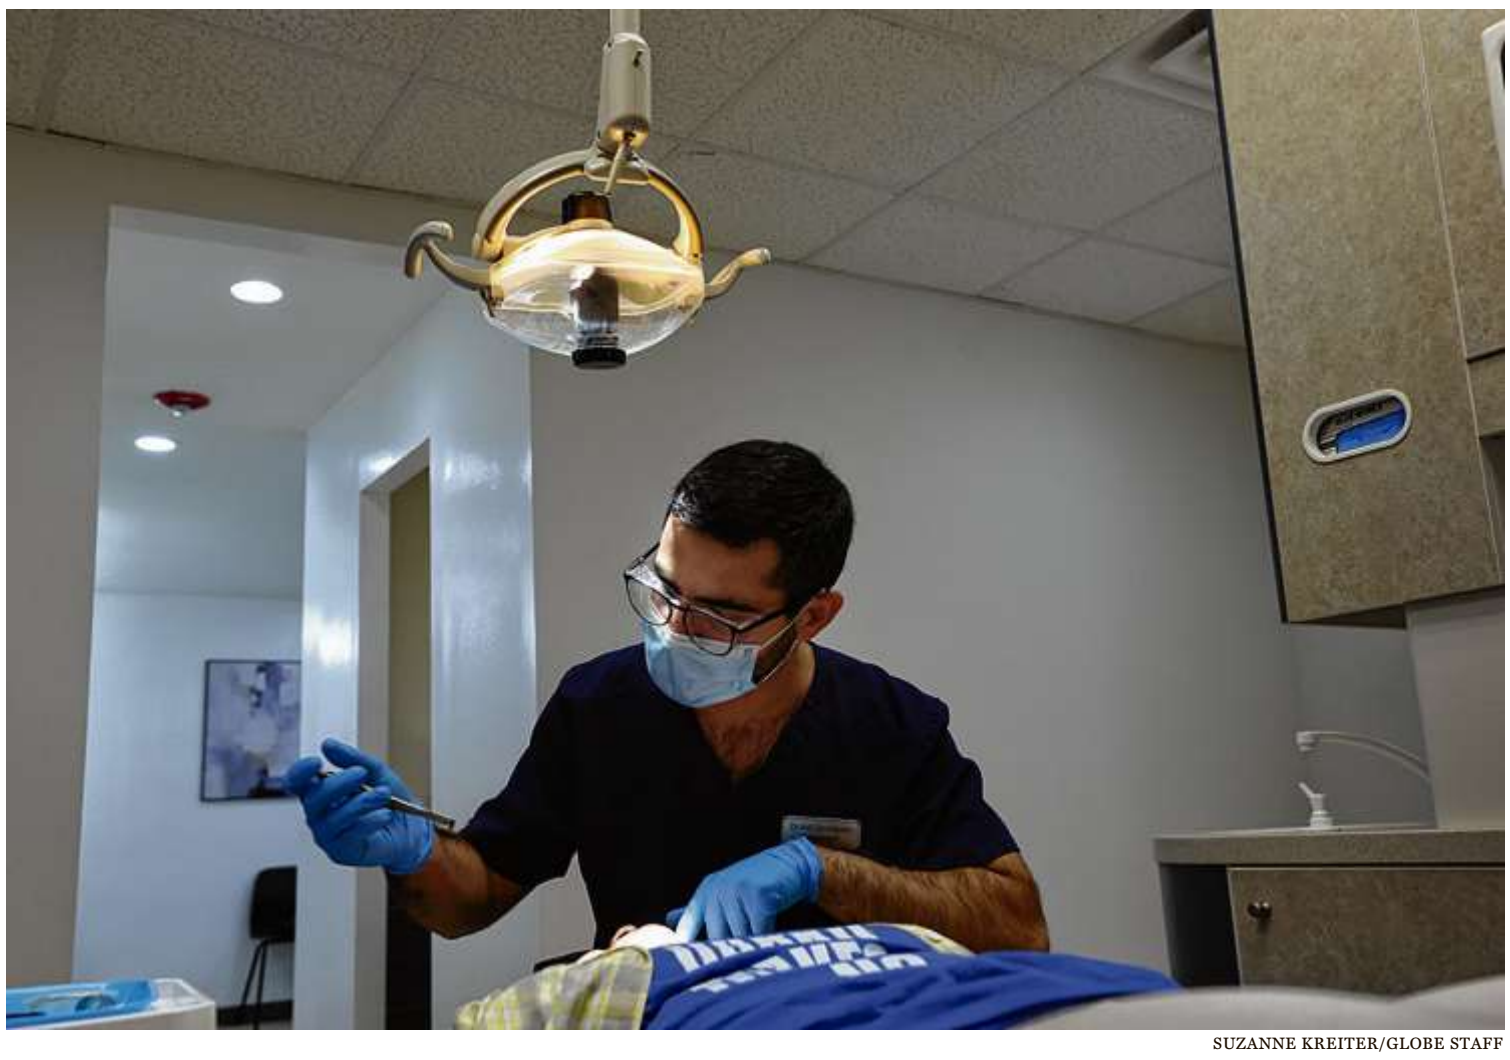

The complaint did not say where the alleged attacks took place, nor when they were reported.

It was not clear whether Monseair had obtained an attorney to

COACH, Page A4

Dental program still recovering

Delays in care, payments prove costly to MassHealth patients, doctors

SUZANNE KREITER/GLOBE STAFF

Dr. Adi Davidyan at his orthodontic practice in Somerville. Some of his patients have waited months for treatment approvals.

By Jason Laughlin
GLOBE STAFF

SOMERVILLE — In April 2025, then-9-year-old Davi Oliveira faced a common, if not always welcome, childhood rite of passage: He needed braces.

His orthodontist, Dr. Adi Davidyan, also recommended a palate expander to prevent a permanently misaligned jaw. Davidyan contacted MassHealth, Davi's insurer, to approve treatments.

Then they waited ... and waited ...

Davi's diagnosis coincided with the near-total collapse last year of the administrative functions, from claims processing to treatment approvals, needed to keep the state's Medicaid dental program functioning. MassHealth, the state's Medicaid administrator, and the Pennsylvania contractor that last year took over administrative tasks offered dueling explanations over how things got so bungled, but in the interim, an untold number of patients missed out on needed care for months.

Davi finally got approval for braces in October, nearly 18 months after his initial diagnosis. In that time, the bones in his palate have become less pliable, likely complicating his care, Davidyan said.

A second patient of Davidyan's waited more than 64 days for MassHealth to approve braces. At one point in June 2025, Davidyan got so frustrated he sent a message to MassHealth.

"This member is being abused by every single employee of the MassHealth and BeneCare program," he wrote. "If not treated immediately, she is at risk of losing ALL HER FRONT TEETH."

The crisis got so acute that in October 2025, the state announced the unusual step of firing BeneCare. DentaQuest, its previous administrator, took over again in February. Its current contract, worth up to $34 million, is effective through June 2027. Yet even now, MassHealth is still repairing the damage.

"The challenges and disruption in payments that dental providers experienced were completely unacceptable," a MassHealth spokesperson said in a statement.

Some dental providers are

DENTAL, Page A6

Amid problems with the state's Medicaid dental program, the Legislature approved a $1,750-per-patient annual dental coverage cap for adults.

There had been no cap previously.

Voters say no to bid for smaller lot sizes

Ballot question aimed at boosting starter homes loses

By Andrew Brinker
GLOBE STAFF

Massachusetts voters narrowly rejected a ballot measure designed to make it easier to build starter homes accessible to middle-class buyers, as a campaign focused on easing the state's deepening affordability crisis was unable to bring enough voters to its side.

Question 7 was the latest effort aimed at boosting Massachusetts' housing supply — which leaders have declared to be among the state's most urgent issues — to run into resistance from residents leery of development.

A razor-thin margin between the sides meant the race took days to call. While the final tally was still pending as of late Friday, the Associated Press projected a win for "No," with 50.6 percent of votes cast against Question 7 and 99 percent of the vote reported.

Proponents hoped the measure would help lower development costs and give builders an incentive to construct smaller and more affordable homes.

"We're disappointed," said Andrew Mikula, chief housing economist at the Pioneer Institute and the author of Question 7. "Despite overwhelming evidence that housing affordability and production are priorities for Massachusetts voters, [the ballot measure] will not immediately be among the solutions to our housing challenges."

The measure would have established a state-

HOUSING, Page A7

'If you want to know about it, you really do have to read about it.'

KATHRYN CODUTO, assistant professor of media science, Boston University

Crowds, chaos missing from Farwell trial

Rules against cameras set different tone in court

By Aidan Ryan
GLOBE STAFF

The trial of former police detective Matthew Farwell has had all of the makings of a media sensation: allegations that Farwell killed a young, pregnant Sandra Birchmore, after grooming and sexually exploiting her from age 15 and staging her suicide, and that state law enforcement overlooked key details in its investigation.

But unlike the trials of Karen Read and Lindsay Clancy — two murder cases that drew true-crime sleuths, global news outlets, and crowds of spectators to Massachusetts — the Farwell trial hasn't been mobbed by media or crowds.

The reason could lie in one notable difference. The trial isn't being broadcast, meaning there is no televised feed and no clips circulating on TikTok. The trial is being held in federal court, where video, or cameras of any kind, are not allowed.

Televised trials can now be amplified on social media, where followers can access a seemingly endless scroll of coverage, conspiracy theories, and armchair analysis. But at a time when Americans increasingly watch video on platforms such as YouTube and TikTok, the lack of video from a trial

TRIAL, Page A6

MELECK ELDAHSHOURY FOR THE BOSTON GLOBE

A journalist stood outside the John Joseph Moakley Federal Courthouse Friday, preparing to report on the Farwell trial.

Skid more

Saturday: Cloudy, showers. High: 57-62. Low: 46-51.
Sunday: Showers ending. High: 58-63. Low: 45-50.
Sunrise: 6:25 Sunset: 4:30
Comics and Weather, D4-5.
Obituaries, C9.

VOL. 310, NO. 130
*
Suggested retail price
$4.00

0 947725 4 44619

The fate of Defense Secretary Pete Hegseth is one of the biggest questions in the aftermath of the midterm elections. A2.

Airstrikes hit a market in Yemen, killing at least 30 people, according to an official with the Iran-backed Houthi rebels. A3.

Governor Maura Healey used her executive authority to deem an abortion law an emergency, putting it into effect immediately and blocking an attempt to suspend the measure. B1.

The monthslong strike at Encore Boston Harbor has ended as workers voted to ratify an agreement, the unions announced. D1.

What psychologists see in 'You Can See Everything'

Film has plenty of fodder for professionals

By Jason Laughlin
GLOBE STAFF

The title of Nathan Fielder's Elizabeth Holmes documentary, "You Can See Everything," is deliberately ironic.

The film examines whether Holmes, who persuaded investors to pump billions into her company, Theranos, on the promise of a medical device that didn't work, is a savvy con artist or simply an unwitting victim of her own ways of communicating, which her romantic partner Billy Evans describes as "not normal."

Holmes opened her life to filmmakers for weeks before her 11-year prison sentence in 2023, leading to a head-spinning movie that leaves the viewer with deep uncertainty over who Holmes truly is.

To try and understand, a Globe reporter watched the film with three psychologists, and asked what they saw. (To be clear, none has personally treated Holmes). They were:

■ Alice Connors-Kellgren, psychologist and director of psychology and psychology training at Tufts Medical Center, with a PhD in counseling psychology.

■ Matt Jerram, psychologist at Boston Neuropsychological Services and chair of the psychology department at Suffolk University,

HOLMES, Page A5