Professors urge leaders to work as one against administration’s attacks

PRINCETON, N.J. — Princeton’s campus was a sea of orange and black on a recent Saturday, as alumni crowded the route of the P-Rade, an annual reunion honoring each graduating class.

As Princeton’s president, Christopher Eisgruber, strolled the Elm Drive parade route, a young woman standing with members of the class of 2019 shouted, “Stand up to Trump!”

Eisgruber, like many university leaders, has slowly taken steps to stand up for academic independence as the Trump administration has taken extraordinary moves to overhaul higher education, particularly at elite schools.

Harvard University has suffered most of President Trump’s blows, with the president stripping nearly $3 billion in federal funds and trying to prevent its international students from entering the US. The university has filed two lawsuits challenging the legality of the Trump administration’s tactics.

At other schools, university presidents are giving interviews and campus speeches critical of the Plan to electrify T bus fleet by 2040 stalling

Soaring costs and delays plague ambitious project

Three years ago, the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority laid out a timeline to electrify its bus fleet by the end of the next decade. With the agency facing a state mandate to get the job done, the plan was more than just an ambitious climate goal.

By 2028, the MBTA aimed to have purchased hundreds of battery electric buses, enough to make up nearly 30 percent of its fleet, and to overhaul the first three of its maintenance facilities to charge the vehicles.

Today, only eight buses of more than 1,000 are all-electric, and garage retrofit and rebuild projects are years behind schedule, casting serious doubt on the T’s ability to fully deliver on its electrification obligations by 2040.

“There’s no way they are going to meet it,” said Brian Kane, executive director of the MBTA Advisory Board.

LOS ANGELES — Tensions in Los Angeles escalated Sunday as thousands of protesters took to the streets in response to President Trump’s extraordinary deployment of the National Guard, blocking off a major freeway and setting self-driving cars on fire as law enforcement used tear gas, rubber bullets, and flash bangs to control the crowd.

Some police patrolled the streets on horseback while others with riot gear lined up behind Guard troops deployed to protect federal facilities including a detention center where some immigrants were taken in recent days.

Police declared an unlawful assembly, and by early evening

REPRESENTATIVE MAXWELL FROST, said of President Trump’s travel ban on 12 countries including Haiti

Haitians, once more, targeted by president

Starting Monday, latest travel ban seeks to boost national security, supporters say

WASHINGTON — In early 2018, President Trump was in a meeting with lawmakers working on an immigration policy compromise when he used an expletive that sent shockwaves through Washington.

“Why are we having all these people from [expletive]hole countries come here?” Trump said, according to The Washington Post, referring to Haiti and African nations.

Trump then said there should be more immigrants from countries like Norway, according to those in the room. It would not be the last time he would disparage the Caribbean nation nor try to decrease migration to the United States from it.

So when Haiti was included late Wednesday in a list of countries on which Trump was imposing a near-total travel ban, some saw a culmination of a long campaign against the population.

“Donald Trump has been very consistent in his anti-Black racism, both domestically and globally, and when it comes to the country of Haiti, the people of Haiti, he has a long track record of vile, offensive, harmful rhetoric and policies,” said Boston Representative Ayanna Pressley, who co-chairs the congressional Haiti Caucus. “It is just purely evil.”

Transforming a moment into a movement

Nonprofit fund that launched after Floyd’s slaying navigates through DEI detours

When Makeeba McCreary became president of the New Commonwealth Racial Equity and Social Justice Fund in September 2021, she had one burning question: “How long are people going to keep George Floyd top of mind?”

Soon she had an answer: about 18 months.

The New Commonwealth Fund was born in June 2020, just weeks after the brutal murder of George Floyd, out of a sense of urgency to end systemic racism. It was the brainchild of 19 Black and brown civic leaders in Boston who put in their own resources and those of their respective corporate foundations — among them Eastern Bank, State Street, Blue Cross Blue Shield of Massachusetts — with a goal of eventually raising $100 million.

But racism wasn’t the only crisis gripping the country in those days. There was also COVID-19. And when the face masks started to come off in 2022, McCreary saw how society was ready, even eager, to move on from both Floyd and the pandemic.

It was a familiar, vicious cycle for Black America — progress, followed by painful setbacks. There was emancipation, then Jim Crow laws; the Civil Rights acts, then a generation of men jailed in the War on Drugs; equal opportunity laws, then a Supreme Court striking down affirmative action in college admissions.

And now America has gone from
